Supporting a patient to use morphine in a rehabilitation facility: a qualitative study of social care staff. This qualitative study describes how nurses and occupational therapists in the UK are educated to support patients' self-administration of morphine for post-surgical pain and post-traumatic pain, while also ensuring the safety of the patient. It highlights issues raised when staff have concerns about administering morphine to some patients, particularly if there is a risk to the patient or if drug use might cause harm. Data collection was by purposeful sample of three groups of practitioners working in English National Health Service acute rehabilitation units. Data were collected through focus groups and interviews with participants. Twenty-eight staff took part in two focus groups and interviews. Data were analysed using Interpretative Phenomenological Analysis (IPA) software. There were six major themes that emerged from data and these were: 'assessing risk', 'referral and discussion', 'medication safety', 'non-pharmacological management', 'pharmacological management' and 'lessons learned'. To enable safe self-administration of morphine, staff were expected to make their own decisions based on the complex and multidimensional picture that each individual patient presented. It is vital to consider risk when providing care and to work with others, including patients, carers and others who may have a role to play in the management of pain. Regular discussions on morphine use between the clinical team are important for the safe management of patients on morphine. Education and training can increase the safety of patients who self-administer their own morphine.
