We've seen a high-level technical overview of the SoC, with details on how the architecture stacks up against ARM- and NVIDIA-based SoCs, and we've also seen a few pictures of the SoC under the notebook camera lens. However, a more detailed breakdown of the specifications of the SoC has yet to be revealed. The new SoC design will be based on an updated 65nm Tri-Gate process, and will feature a dual-core x86 processor clocked at 1GHz, 1.6GHz DDR3 memory controller, 512KB L1 cache, and 1MB L2 cache on the die. It's also been confirmed that the new SoC will support LPDDR2 memory, so the ARM SoCs do not have that as a specification. The SoC will support some form of encryption, though at this time AMD has not said exactly what the encryption is or what it is based on. We can expect AES instructions, though we won't know more about those until the company's launch event is held. On the graphics front, we can expect to see a choice between ATI's HD 4000 and the next-generation "Southern Islands" Radeon HD 5000 series graphics from AMD. We can expect the graphics to be based on the new GCN architecture, and will come with 512-bit memory interface, 128-bit memory bus, new L2 cache
