Threshold Masking

Threshold masking, also known as Threshold Selection, is a Photoshop action that cuts out specific and/or specific areas of an image. It can be used to remove objects from a photo (often to replace them with a completely new object), change colors or blur areas in an image, or make a range of colors appear muted in comparison to their surroundings. Threshold masking in Photoshop is available in the Actions panel and also the Layers panel. To apply a threshold mask, either select an area in the image that you would like to edit and then choose Edit ► Threshold Mask ► Cut Out to create a new file from the selected area of the image, or create a new image file in the area you would like to have handled differently. (A threshold mask can also be created using actions like Select ► Create Custom Shape ► Threshold Mask.) e3d0a04c9c

The human brain is the most complex and intelligent thing on the planet. The visual cortex of the brain is the part that deals with sight, perception and visualization of images and objects in a person's head. Each visual area in the brain is different, having specific brain cells and processes. The visual cortex is made up of areas such as V1, V2, V3, V4, V5, V6, V7, and the calcarine sulcus. Each area responds to a particular kind of object or event. Each area specializes in a certain task, like the eye being specific for color, the ear for sound, and the nose for smells. The visual cortex is divided into discrete regions. There are four main types of vision, which include the following six areas:

- Primary V1 is the entry point for visual imagery. It extracts the basic features of our environment, such as shape, motion, and color, and these features are fed into the various other areas of the brain.
- Primary V2 is the high-level area of what an animal sees. It is the area that gives us 2D images.
- Primary V3 has the motion and depth perception necessary to track objects.
- Primary V4 is the human visual cortex's storehouse of memories. It appears to be what we refer to as a 'wildcard', due to it being intuitive and largely non-directional. It allows us to 'see' general shapes rather than details.
- Primary V5 is the region that processes the motion or action effects of an image.
- Primary V6 is a high-level area that processes the color, shape, and texture of the object seen.
